With my counselor, I’ve learned ways to stay safe and ways to not be nervous and not be scared.

- DVIS Childrens Client
In 2017, DVIS celebrated 25 years of their Children’s Trauma Program. As a childhood survivor of domestic violence, this anniversary holds particular meaning for me.

Some of my earliest childhood memories were being pushed with my younger sisters into an adjoining room so my father could beat my mother. By the time I was six years old, I knew the drill. I would comfort my sisters while my screaming mother was pummeled with fists and strangled into unconsciousness. Then, when it was over, I would get a glass of water and an icepack for my mother and listen to my dad as he apologized for his actions.

It was a scene that played out again and again throughout my childhood. My mother was the breadwinner. She didn’t need my father. But she stayed. Because the threat that he might kill her was outweighed by the certainty he would if she tried to leave. She stayed with him for 41 years until he passed away after years of alcohol abuse, and he was angry and violent to the very end.

As I think back on my childhood, I must acknowledge how blessed I have been. I married a wonderful man who respects me and would never hurt me. And he is an amazing father. Ted is a gift I have given to my children. Proudly, my sisters also married wonderful men who have been role models for their children. We were able to somehow break the cycle of violence. Our children will never have to face the circumstances we experienced in our childhood. We have not forgotten our past, but we have channeled that childhood trauma to become caring, compassionate women.

Statistically speaking, my sisters and I are an exception. According to a study completed by The United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) in North America, children who are exposed to violence in the home are 15 times more likely to be physically and/or sexually assaulted than the national average. This means that my sisters and I were 15 times more likely to experience abuse in our lifetime than children who were never exposed to domestic violence.

It breaks my heart that many children live with the daily impact of domestic violence. This is why DVIS’ work through their Children’s Trauma Program is so important. DVIS provides hope for a better future.

Shiela Haynes
DVIS Board President
I am happy to report that 2017 has been an amazing year for DVIS! Early in the year, staff was thrilled to move into the Moran Family Counseling Center. As we designed the building, we made sure that every room had a window, allowing natural light in and creating an atmosphere that is welcoming, open and warm. It is our hope that the new facility will be a place where survivors can find safety, dignity, inspiration, courage and hope as they begin to rebuild their lives after experiencing abuse.

DVIS also expanded our inclusion efforts. As a part of this initiative, we hired an Underserved Outreach Advocate to reach out to marginalized groups such as the Deaf and hard of hearing, lgbt+, those with limited English proficiency and those living in rural areas. We also added a partnership with the University of Tulsa and have continued serving students at TCC.

In 2017, DVIS became the first domestic violence program in Oklahoma to earn national CARF accreditation for the outpatient treatment of survivors, offenders and children. This three-year accreditation decision represents the highest level of accreditation that can be given to an organization and shows DVIS’ substantial conformance to the CARF standards.

Finally, DVIS commemorated 25 years of serving children affected by domestic and sexual violence. When we first opened our Children’s Trauma Program, we only offered childcare. Today, we offer full counseling services to children from birth to 18 who have been exposed to violence. We also played an integral role in establishing a Child Welfare DV Unit within the Oklahoma Department of Human Services (DHS). Many times, parents don’t realize the impact violence has on their children. According to a UNICEF study, “the single best predictor of children becoming either perpetrators or victims of domestic violence later in life is whether or not they grow up in a home where there is domestic violence.” This is the reason our Children’s Trauma Program is so important – it is the most powerful step we can take to stop the cycle of violence.

As you read through the remainder of this annual report, you will see many wonderful accomplishments from our agency and the Children’s Trauma Program that were made possible by your generosity. Please know that your support of DVIS has helped to stop the cycle of violence in our community.

Tracey Lyall, MSW, LSW
Chief Executive Officer

“A NOTE FROM TRACEY

I will probably remember all of the scary things that happened, but it doesn’t always have to make me sad. I am in control of my thoughts and feelings… I know ways to stay safe and to have a good life.

“I learned that I can be whatever I want when I grow up. I don’t have to be like my dad or like my mom – I can be anything in the whole entire world.”

- DVIS Childrens Client
Creating a Future Without Violence

DVIS has been working to create a future without violence through their Children’s Trauma Program for 25 years! We took a look back to see what a child survivor and two former employees had to say about their experience.

Erin Maloney
Former client

“It was good to have someone to talk out everything that happened with my dad. It gave me perspective to see that this is just one thing in my life and to not let it hinder me or hold me back.

Counseling helped a lot in how I handle things as an adult. It helped me to have a different attitude about things and realize that aggression is never the answer. My time at DVIS taught me to take a minute, see things as they are and work to fix them.

DVIS gave me an outlet to talk about my problems. It was wonderful to be in a group with kids who had been in a similar situation as you. And then getting to also meet individually with a trusted counselor was really helpful. I remember, we used to play with clay and make pots. As a kid, it was a really safe and fun way to talk out everything that was happening in my life.”

Lakeia Robinson
Former Children’s Program Manager

“This family that really impacted me was a client who was so determined to make a better life for her family. I remember she used to get up at 5:30 a.m. to iron her kid’s clothes, so they could get on the daycare bus in time for her to get on the city bus to be at work by 8 a.m. As I type this, all of those clients who made a lasting mark on my heart keep visiting my mind, and I’m wishing them well and smiling about the amazing strength and determination they displayed.

Children have their own unique experiences of domestic violence and they need to have people who bring those experiences into the light of day so that they can heal, suffer less, and be free to laugh, play and have little kid worries.

Children are often along for the ride in domestically violent relationships. The abused parent’s ability to protect her children is hindered by her ability to keep herself safe. Despite going to great lengths to provide what safety she can to her children, it is impossible to be the kind of parent you want when your life is in danger or you are being systematically emotionally abused.”

Ashleigh Kraft
Former Children’s Program Manager

“Children are tomorrow’s leaders and it is important to address the impact that trauma has on their lives.”
DVIS worked with DHS to establish a new Domestic Violence Unit. DVIS provided the unit, which was started in April of 2017, extensive training on domestic violence and its effects on children. Additionally, DVIS assisted in establishing best practices to assist victims of domestic violence in safety planning, developing a strong support system, and providing early intervention for batterers. Additionally, DVIS has an embedded advocate within DHS. The partnership has enabled families affected by domestic and sexual violence to receive coordinated services from both agencies.

“Working with DVIS has allowed DHS employees to have a greater understanding of the unique power and control dynamics faced by families who have experienced domestic violence,” said Child Welfare Supervisor-Domestic Violence Unit Matthew Baccus. “This knowledge has allowed our team to develop additional tools to assess the safety of children in these situations.”

When determining parental competency, the new Domestic Violence Task Force has invited an embedded DVIS advocate to sit in on Child Safety Meetings. In these meetings, DHS and the DVIS advocate meet with both parents separately to build a safety plan for the family. If a suitable safety plan is created, the victim and children are often able to stay together in the same home. The embedded DVIS advocate also coordinates with parents, walking them through the entire process for both agencies.

“The partnership between DVIS and DHS has allowed additional support for families who have experienced an enormous amount of trauma,” said DVIS Vice President of Children’s Trauma Programs Crystal Brill. “Our advocate is able to increase feelings of safety and walk families through what many perceive to be an intimidating process.”
On March 30, 2017, DVIS dedicated The Moran Family Counseling Center. The new, 30,000 sq. ft. building has many features that help to create a warm, welcoming and safe environment for clients and staff:

- Separate waiting room for offenders and survivors
- Spacious group rooms
- Childcare room and outdoor play area
- Two specialized child therapy rooms
- Secure entryways
- Courtyards for employees
- Multipurpose Training Room
- Board Room

As DVIS works to fulfill its mission and vision, The Moran Family Counseling Center is meant to be a beacon of hope, help and safety to families in Tulsa and the surrounding communities. The building is dedicated to:

- The survivors who will seek to rebuild their lives within these walls
- The children who will stop the cycle of violence by learning about safety and healthy relationships
- The offenders who will seek help and become free from violence
- The caring professionals who will change/transform the lives of countless families within these walls
- The board members and generous donors who will give their time, talent and treasure
- And the Tulsa Community, as we all work together to create a future without violence
